PROPOSALS

FOR RE-PRINTING BY SUBSCRIPTION

A DICTIONARY

OF THE

Arabick, Perſian, and Turkiſh Languages,

Compiled and firſt Publiſhed by

MENINSKI,

IN FOUR VOLUMES FOLIO:

Reviſed and Corrected by

WILLIAM JONES, ESQ.

Fellow of UNIVERSITY-COLLEGE, Oxford,

Tranſlator of the Life of NADER CHAH from the Perſian.

With an ENGLISH TRANSLATION and INDEX.

IT is unneceſſary in theſe Propoſals to point out minutely the particular Excellence of the Dictionary which we propoſe to reprint, ſince it has been for near a Century admired by all Europe, and its extreme Scarcity univerſally regretted. A Work which for ſo long a Period has met with general Approbation, and has been ſought with ſuch Avidity by Men of every Rank and Profeſſion, muſt, certainly, have a real and intrinſick Merit, to which no Commendation can add, and from which no Cenſure can detract.

It may not however be improper to ſubjoin a few Arguments in Favour of this Work, and demonſtrate its peculiar Uſefulneſs in facilitating the Attainment of the Perſian (a Language at preſent of ſuch Importance to the Honourable Eaſt-India Company) more eſpecially as thoſe who are unacquainted with the Subject might poſſibly imagine that a Dictionary including the ARABICK and TURKISH as well as the PERSIAN, was not neceſſary for thoſe who wiſh to acquire a Knowledge of the PERSIAN only.

The Dialects of Arabia and Perſia were extremely different in their Origin; but they were entirely united and blended together when the Arabs ſpread over Aſia their Arms, their Religion, and their Learning. The conquered Nations received with Eagerneſs the Literature of their Conquerors: They conſidered it as a Mark of Erudition and of Elegance to uſe Arabick Words and Expreſſions, and to fill their Writings with Alluſions to the Arabian Poems and Proverbs: Beſides, from a Principle of Piety, they adopted the Language and even the Letters of their Koran. The Ottoman Conqueſts in After-times diffuſed their Dialect over half the Eaſt; it became even the Language of the Court of Perſia, where it is ſtill ſpoken, and made its Way into many Parts of India; thus, by Degrees, the Idioms of thoſe Tongues were almoſt changed, and became Dialects of one vaſt Language, which mutually enrich and illuſtrate each other; like a Number of little States, reſigning their private Laws, and concurring to form one extenſive Empire.

Several very learned Turks, it may alſo be obſerved, have tranſlated and explained in their Dialect the moſt celebrated Poems of Perſia, which would be abſolutely unintelligible to us without ſuch Explanation; and even their Military Terms, in ſome of the modern Perſian Hiſtories, are borrowed from the Turks. As the proper underſtanding of one Word or Phraſe, therefore, determines often the Senſe of a whole Paſſage, where ſuch Word or Phraſe in the Writings of a Perſian happens to be Turkiſh or Arabick, it is obvious that a Dictionary where theſe three Languages are diſplayed at one View can only ſolve the Difficulty; and that a Dictionary of the Perſian alone could in ſuch Caſe afford no Manner of Aſſiſtance. Excluſive alſo of the Advantage which the Perſic Student muſt receive from an Acquaintance with the Arabick and the Turkiſh, theſe Languages may be of Importance to the Honourable Eaſt-India Company's Servants in their commercial or political Concerns at Mocha, Baſſora, and other Places under the Turkiſh Dominion on the Red-Sea or Perſian Gulph; the Arabick being in many of thoſe Countries the vulgar Tongue, and Turkiſh the Language of the Great Officers of State.

To conclude: Theſe three Languages, or, more properly, theſe three Dialects of one Language, are by no Means ſo difficult as we are taught to believe: A moderate Application for a few Months will enable the Learner to proceed with Eaſe and Pleaſure, and in a few Years he may read and write them with Facility; in which Study the Dictionary of MENINSKI will afford him all the Aſſiſtance he can require; as the beſt Orientaliſts have derived their Knowledge from it, and its Utility been ſo peculiarly experienced by Gentlemen in India, that they have ſent Commiſſions to England to purchaſe it at any Price; whilſt Dictionaries of the Perſian only, have been conſidered of no Value, as inadequate to teach the Language.

The Oriental Words and Phraſes are explained by MENINSKI in Five European Languages, Latin, French, Italian, German, and Poliſh: But for the Uſe of our Countrymen, to whom thoſe Languages may not be familiar, we ſhall add an Engliſh Tranſlation, and an Index of every Word.

The Types deſigned for this Work are entirely new, and are copied from the moſt elegant Arabian Characters, in which all the Books of polite Literature in the Eaſt are written; and which are intelligible to every Mahometan, as the Koran is expreſſed in no other: But that nothing may be omitted, we ſhall inſert ſeveral Plates of Perſian Odes, engraved from the moſt beautiful Manuſcripts in the common flowing Hand uſed in India.

From FIFTY to SIXTY GUINEAS is the preſent Price of a Copy of MENINSKI: But in order to bring this great and uſeful Work within the Compaſs of general Purchaſe, the propoſed improved Edition will be delivered to Subſcribers at TWELVE GUINEAS: It is hoped therefore the Subſcription will be proportionably liberal; and that thoſe who conſider this Publication as an Object of Encouragement, will ſend their Addreſs as early as poſſible.——A Copy will not be ſold to Non-Subſcribers under SIXTEEN GUINEAS.——This Work it is expected will be publiſhed in 1773.

A LIST of the SUBSCRIBERS will be prefixed to the Work.

SUBSCRIPTIONS are received and RECEIPTS given by W. and J. RICHARDSON, No 12 and 13 in Salisbury-Court, and No 76 in Fleet-Street, where may be had Propoſals at large.

Six Guineas to be paid at Subſcribing, and Six Guineas on the Delivery of the Book in Sheets.
